At sight of me some kind Americans, whom I had met in Egypt, came forward to greet me, expressing surprise that I was not frightened to death arriving in this country all alone! As a rule, they travel in a decidedly gregarious fashion; so my plan of tour generally afforded them some surprise. I met many Americans both in Egypt and Syria, and always found them most kind, intelligent, and sympathizing. After passing one somewhat uncomfortable night, I was, thanks to Mr. Howards kind arrangement, shifted to a pleasant upper room, which looked straight toward the Mount of Olives. I had felt some inward trepidation on seeing the crowded state of affairs, and thus the more appreciated this haven; its appropriation to me caused, I fear, some chagrin to an old lady, who imagined she had a prior claim to it. The arrangements of the house were of a rough and scratch character, but there was no stint of food, such as it was; and the waiters, though insufficient in number for the momentary demand, were most active and obliging. She was supposed to be a housemaid, but, I am obliged to confess, fulfilled her duties in a far less satisfactory manner than does the usual house-man. She dawned on me like an apparition, as, small and low of stature, she entered my room entirely veiled in M her dark hair, which flowed loose all round her, reaching far below her waist. It can be imagined that this appendage interfered considerably with the performance of her work, and portions of these locks had a knack of depositing themselves where not
