Excerpt from Black Moss, Vol. 2: A Tale by a Tarn Gideon Cuyp, as he dipped along that afternoon behind that wall, had heard too much either for his ease or his peace. He had heard two things which were not pleasant to hear. He now knew that the Vicar of Black Moss conjectured that something might be wrong about the coat which had been carried to Job Redcar. Guy Melchior, it is true, told Minna that he wanted to be rid of the suspicion; but then he might not always so want to be rid of it.
